

Central Intelligence Agency

DIRECTORATE OF INTELLIGENCE 21 October 1983

Summary
The Figueiredo administration has been discredited by its recent handling of the economy and seems unable to halt the decline of its political fortunes. Buffeted by intractable economic problems, the government also is Brasilia is confronting not only mounting public resistance to austerity and an assertive opposition but also a dissident wing within its own party. There are some indications of restiveness within the military, although the high command remains loyal to Figueiredo and the possibility of a coup seems remote unless there is a rapid and widespread deterioration of public order.	25X1 25X6 25X1
his small coterie of military and civilian advisers will continue to wield significant power, following policies similar to those of the last few months and likely with mixed results at best. The economic crisis will not soon improve, and the dismantling of the authoritarian political system in preparation for a return to civilian rule in 1985 has left Brasilia without the legal means of quelling dissent and forcing its programs through the increasingly independent Congress. Even if Figueiredo resumes a more active role—as may be signaled by recent initiatives vis—a—vis the Congress and opposition leaders—we believe he is not likely to regain control over the political process. The government probably will continue pushing for austerity while trying to deflect criticism, but growing unrest will heighten pressures for significant changes in policy and leadership. Although we do not foresee a major political crisis over the near term, the administration will be forced to make additional concessions and ultimately may have to consider more drastic	25X6
This memorandum was requested by the National Security Council. It was prepared by South America Division, Office of African and Latin American Analysis, and was coordinated with the Directorate of Operations. It contains information available as of 21 October 1983. Questions and comments	25X1
may be directed to the Chief, South America Division, ALA	25 X 1
ALA-M-83-10167C	25 X 1
$COPY \coprod Of 2$
COPY_II_ of _2.	25 X 1

Sanitized Copy Approved for Release 2010/11/26: CIA-RDP85T00287R000500050001-3

25X1

administration' program. In ou compromise with disbursements n of major debt d surmounted, we imperatives aga believe Brazili	s wage-restraing view, the government congress, but eccessary to conference continuations foresee continuations political an policymaker.	e Brazilian Congress nt policy, a key ele vernment ultimately at the cost of furt ntain foreign paymen Even if the immed uing difficulties in pressures over the s will view declaring	ement of the aust will succeed in ther delaying load ts arrears and the liate wage hurdle to balancing finant next year. As a	erity negotiating a an to avoid risks e is ncial a result, we
	*	*	*	* 3 . $
P S wy a S w
liberalizatio	disli Although h onmade him	ikes politicians his commitment to the most popul a r	aberturaor	political norsetrading. liberalizatio presidents wh	disli Although honmade him nen he took o	his commitment to the most popular office in 1979, he	aberturaor of Brazil's has relied a	political military lmost norsetrading. liberalization presidents wh exclusively of decisions. H	dislication dislication distributed by the distribu	his commitment to the most popular office in 1979,	aberturaor of Brazil's has relied a to make and ing Minister Deconomic woes-	political military lmost mplement elfimwhom -apparently Government Losing Initiative The administration is feeling the brunt of rising public discontent and social unrest. Labor, the middle class, and the business community have joined the opposition parties in condemning the government's austerity program. Some in these groups are suggesting Figueiredo resign, and a national poll conducted last month gave him the lowest popularity rating ever registered in Brazil. Lower-class discontent is being manifested in lootings, with over 200 supermarkets ransacked in September. Divisions within the ruling party are contributing to the government's dilemma. Dissidents captured some 35 percent of the seats on the party's national directorate in elections last June, general discussions of grievances. Government Losing Initiative The administration is feeling the brunt of rising public discontent and social unrest. Labor, the middle class, and the business community have joined the opposition parties in condemning the government's austerity program. Some in these groups are suggesting Figueiredo resign, and a national poll conducted last month gave him the lowest popularity rating ever registered in Brazil. Lower-class discontent is being manifested in lootings, with over 200 supermarkets ransacked in September. Divisions within the ruling party are contributing to the government's dilemma. Dissidents captured some 35 percent of the seats on the party's national directorate in elections last June, and the administration has been unable to maintain party discipline on the wage-law issue before Congress. Moreover, Figueiredo seems powerless to impose his choice for president. Congressman Maluf, whom Figueiredo detests, is far ahead in the race for the party's nomination. According to Embassy reporting, some government officials are speculating that the President may general discussions of grievances. Government Losing Initiative The administration is feeling the brunt of rising public discontent and social unrest. Labor, the middle class, and the business community have joined the opposition parties in condemning the government's austerity program. Some in these groups are suggesting Figueiredo resign, and a national poll conducted last month gave him the lowest popularity rating ever registered in Brazil. Lower-class discontent is being manifested in lootings, with over 200 supermarkets ransacked in September. Divisions within the ruling party are contributing to the government's dilemma. Dissidents captured some 35 percent of the seats on the party's national directorate in elections last June, and the administration has been unable to maintain party discipline on the wage-law issue before Congress. Moreover, Figueiredo seems powerless to impose his choice for president. Congressman Maluf, whom Figueiredo detests, is far ahead in the race for the party's nomination. According to Embassy reporting, some government officials are speculating that the President may general discussions of grievances. Government Losing Initiative The administration is feeling the brunt of rising public discontent and social unrest. Labor, the middle class, and the business community have joined the opposition parties in condemning the government's austerity program. Some in these groups are suggesting Figueiredo resign, and a national poll conducted last month gave him the lowest popularity rating ever registered in Brazil. Lower-class discontent is being manifested in lootings, with over 200 supermarkets ransacked in September. Divisions within the ruling party are contributing to the government's dilemma. Dissidents captured some 35 percent of the seats on the party's national directorate in elections last June, and the administration has been unable to maintain party discipline on the wage-law issue before Congress. Moreover, Figueiredo seems powerless to impose his choice for president. Congressman Maluf, whom Figueiredo detests, is far ahead in the race for the party's nomination. According to Embassy reporting, some government officials are speculating that the President may general discussions of grievances. Government Losing Initiative The administration is feeling the brunt of rising public discontent and social unrest. Labor, the middle class, and the business community have joined the opposition parties in condemning the government's austerity program. Some in these groups are suggesting Figueiredo resign, and a national poll conducted last month gave him the lowest popularity rating ever registered in Brazil. Lower-class discontent is being manifested in lootings, with over 200 supermarkets ransacked in September. Divisions within the ruling party are contributing to the government's dilemma. Dissidents captured some 35 percent of the seats on the party's national directorate in elections last June, and the administration has been unable to maintain party discipline on the wage-law issue before Congress. Moreover, Figueiredo seems powerless to impose his choice for president. Congressman Maluf, whom Figueiredo detests, is far ahead in the race for the party's nomination. According to Embassy reporting, some government officials are speculating that the President may general discussions of grievances. Government Losing Initiative The administration is feeling the brunt of rising public discontent and social unrest. Labor, the middle class, and the business community have joined the opposition parties in condemning the government's austerity program. Some in these groups are suggesting Figueiredo resign, and a national poll conducted last month gave him the lowest popularity rating ever registered in Brazil. Lower-class discontent is being manifested in lootings, with over 200 supermarkets ransacked in September. Divisions within the ruling party are contributing to the government's dilemma. Dissidents captured some 35 percent of the seats on the party's national directorate in elections last June, and the administration has been unable to maintain party discipline on the wage-law issue before Congress. Moreover, Figueiredo seems powerless to impose his choice for president. Congressman Maluf, whom Figueiredo detests, is far ahead in the race for the party's nomination. According to Embassy reporting, some government officials are speculating that the President may general discussions of grievances. Government Losing Initiative The administration is feeling the brunt of rising public discontent and social unrest. Labor, the middle class, and the business community have joined the opposition parties in condemning the government's austerity program. Some in these groups are suggesting Figueiredo resign, and a national poll conducted last month gave him the lowest popularity rating ever registered in Brazil. Lower-class discontent is being manifested in lootings, with over 200 supermarkets ransacked in September. Divisions within the ruling party are contributing to the government's dilemma. Dissidents captured some 35 percent of the seats on the party's national directorate in elections last June, and the administration has been unable to maintain party discipline on the wage-law issue before Congress. Moreover, Figueiredo seems powerless to impose his choice for president. Congressman Maluf, whom Figueiredo detests, is far ahead in the race for the party's nomination. According to Embassy reporting, some government officials are speculating that the President may general discussions of grievances. Government Losing Initiative The administration is feeling the brunt of rising public discontent and social unrest. Labor, the middle class, and the business community have joined the opposition parties in condemning the government's austerity program. Some in these groups are suggesting Figueiredo resign, and a national poll conducted last month gave him the lowest popularity rating ever registered in Brazil. Lower-class discontent is being manifested in lootings, with over 200 supermarkets ransacked in September. Divisions within the ruling party are contributing to the government's dilemma. Dissidents captured some 35 percent of the seats on the party's national directorate in elections last June, and the administration has been unable to maintain party discipline on the wage-law issue before Congress. Moreover, Figueiredo seems powerless to impose his choice for president. Congressman Maluf, whom Figueiredo detests, is far ahead in the race for the party's nomination. According to Embassy reporting, some government officials are speculating that the President may

25X1

general discussions of grievances. Government Losing Initiative The administration is feeling the brunt of rising public discontent and social unrest. Labor, the middle class, and the business community have joined the opposition parties in condemning the government's austerity program. Some in these groups are suggesting Figueiredo resign, and a national poll conducted last month gave him the lowest popularity rating ever registered in Brazil. Lower-class discontent is being manifested in lootings, with over 200 supermarkets ransacked in September. Divisions within the ruling party are contributing to the government's dilemma. Dissidents captured some 35 percent of the seats on the party's national directorate in elections last June, and the administration has been unable to maintain party discipline on the wage-law issue before Congress. Moreover, Figueiredo seems powerless to impose his choice for president. Congressman Maluf, whom Figueiredo detests, is far ahead in the race for the party's nomination. According to Embassy reporting, some government officials are speculating that the President may	We have no indications, however, that any group within
The administration is feeling the brunt of rising public discontent and social unrest. Labor, the middle class, and the business community have joined the opposition parties in condemning the government's austerity program. Some in these groups are suggesting Figueiredo resign, and a national poll conducted last month gave him the lowest popularity rating ever registered in Brazil. Lower-class discontent is being manifested in lootings, with over 200 supermarkets ransacked in September. Divisions within the ruling party are contributing to the government's dilemma. Dissidents captured some 35 percent of the seats on the party's national directorate in elections last June, and the administration has been unable to maintain party discipline on the wage-law issue before Congress. Moreover, Figueiredo seems powerless to impose his choice for president. Congressman Maluf, whom Figueiredo detests, is far ahead in the race for the party's nomination. According to Embassy reporting, some government officials are speculating that the President may	the military has progressed beyond preliminary and still very
The administration is feeling the brunt of rising public discontent and social unrest. Labor, the middle class, and the business community have joined the opposition parties in condemning the government's austerity program. Some in these groups are suggesting Figueiredo resign, and a national poll conducted last month gave him the lowest popularity rating ever registered in Brazil. Lower-class discontent is being manifested in lootings, with over 200 supermarkets ransacked in September. Divisions within the ruling party are contributing to the government's dilemma. Dissidents captured some 35 percent of the seats on the party's national directorate in elections last June, and the administration has been unable to maintain party discipline on the wage-law issue before Congress. Moreover, Figueiredo seems powerless to impose his choice for president. Congressman Maluf, whom Figueiredo detests, is far ahead in the race for the party's nomination. According to Embassy reporting, some government officials are speculating that the President may	general discussions of grievances.
discontent and social unrest. Labor, the middle class, and the business community have joined the opposition parties in condemning the government's austerity program. Some in these groups are suggesting Figueiredo resign, and a national poll conducted last month gave him the lowest popularity rating ever registered in Brazil. Lower-class discontent is being manifested in lootings, with over 200 supermarkets ransacked in September. Divisions within the ruling party are contributing to the government's dilemma. Dissidents captured some 35 percent of the seats on the party's national directorate in elections last June, and the administration has been unable to maintain party discipline on the wage-law issue before Congress. Moreover, Figueiredo seems powerless to impose his choice for president. Congressman Maluf, whom Figueiredo detests, is far ahead in the race for the party's nomination. According to Embassy reporting, some government officials are speculating that the President may	Government Losing Initiative
discontent and social unrest. Labor, the middle class, and the business community have joined the opposition parties in condemning the government's austerity program. Some in these groups are suggesting Figueiredo resign, and a national poll conducted last month gave him the lowest popularity rating ever registered in Brazil. Lower-class discontent is being manifested in lootings, with over 200 supermarkets ransacked in September. Divisions within the ruling party are contributing to the government's dilemma. Dissidents captured some 35 percent of the seats on the party's national directorate in elections last June, and the administration has been unable to maintain party discipline on the wage-law issue before Congress. Moreover, Figueiredo seems powerless to impose his choice for president. Congressman Maluf, whom Figueiredo detests, is far ahead in the race for the party's nomination. According to Embassy reporting, some government officials are speculating that the President may	The administration is feeling the brunt of rising public condemning the government's austerity program. Some in these groups are suggesting Figueiredo resign, and a national poll conducted last month gave him the lowest popularity rating ever registered in Brazil. Lower-class discontent is being manifested in lootings, with over 200 supermarkets ransacked in September. Divisions within the ruling party are contributing to the government's dilemma. Dissidents captured some 35 percent of the seats on the party's national directorate in elections last June, and the administration has been unable to maintain party discipline on the wage-law issue before Congress. Moreover, Figueiredo seems powerless to impose his choice for president. Congressman Maluf, whom Figueiredo detests, is far ahead in the race for the party's nomination. According to Embassy reporting, some government officials are speculating that the President may	discontent and social unrest. Labor, the middle class, and the proups are suggesting Figueiredo resign, and a national poll conducted last month gave him the lowest popularity rating ever registered in Brazil. Lower-class discontent is being manifested in lootings, with over 200 supermarkets ransacked in September. Divisions within the ruling party are contributing to the government's dilemma. Dissidents captured some 35 percent of the seats on the party's national directorate in elections last June, and the administration has been unable to maintain party discipline on the wage-law issue before Congress. Moreover, Figueiredo seems powerless to impose his choice for president. Congressman Maluf, whom Figueiredo detests, is far ahead in the race for the party's nomination. According to Embassy reporting, some government officials are speculating that the President may	business community have joined the opposition parties in conducted last month gave him the lowest popularity rating ever registered in Brazil. Lower-class discontent is being manifested in lootings, with over 200 supermarkets ransacked in September. Divisions within the ruling party are contributing to the government's dilemma. Dissidents captured some 35 percent of the seats on the party's national directorate in elections last June, and the administration has been unable to maintain party discipline on the wage-law issue before Congress. Moreover, Figueiredo seems powerless to impose his choice for president. Congressman Maluf, whom Figueiredo detests, is far ahead in the race for the party's nomination. According to Embassy reporting, some government officials are speculating that the President may	groups are suggesting Figueiredo resign, and a national noll
Divisions within the ruling party are contributing to the government's dilemma. Dissidents captured some 35 percent of the seats on the party's national directorate in elections last June, and the administration has been unable to maintain party discipline on the wage-law issue before Congress. Moreover, Figueiredo seems powerless to impose his choice for president. Congressman Maluf, whom Figueiredo detests, is far ahead in the race for the party's nomination. According to Embassy reporting, some government officials are speculating that the President may	conducted last month gave him the lowest popularity rating ever
Divisions within the ruling party are contributing to the government's dilemma. Dissidents captured some 35 percent of the seats on the party's national directorate in elections last June, and the administration has been unable to maintain party discipline on the wage-law issue before Congress. Moreover, Figueiredo seems powerless to impose his choice for president. Congressman Maluf, whom Figueiredo detests, is far ahead in the race for the party's nomination. According to Embassy reporting, some government officials are speculating that the President may	registered in Brazil. Lower-class discontent is being manifested in lootings, with over 200 supermarkets ransacked in Sontember
government's dilemma. Dissidents captured some 35 percent of the seats on the party's national directorate in elections last June, and the administration has been unable to maintain party discipline on the wage-law issue before Congress. Moreover, Figueiredo seems powerless to impose his choice for president. Congressman Maluf, whom Figueiredo detests, is far ahead in the race for the party's nomination. According to Embassy reporting, some government officials are speculating that the President may	in 1000 mgs, with over 200 supermarkets ransacked in September.
government's dilemma. Dissidents captured some 35 percent of the seats on the party's national directorate in elections last June, and the administration has been unable to maintain party discipline on the wage-law issue before Congress. Moreover, Figueiredo seems powerless to impose his choice for president. Congressman Maluf, whom Figueiredo detests, is far ahead in the race for the party's nomination. According to Embassy reporting, some government officials are speculating that the President may government's dilemma. Dissidents captured some 35 percent of the seats on the party's national directorate in elections last June, and the administration has been unable to maintain party discipline on the wage-law issue before Congress. Moreover, Figueiredo seems powerless to impose his choice for president. Congressman Maluf, whom Figueiredo detests, is far ahead in the race for the party's nomination. According to Embassy reporting, some government officials are speculating that the President may government's dilemma. Dissidents captured some 35 percent of the seats on the party's national directorate in elections last June, and the administration has been unable to maintain party discipline on the wage-law issue before Congress. Moreover, Figueiredo seems powerless to impose his choice for president. Congressman Maluf, whom Figueiredo detests, is far ahead in the race for the party's nomination. According to Embassy reporting, some government officials are speculating that the President may government's dilemma. Dissidents captured some 35 percent of the seats on the party's national directorate in elections last June, and the administration has been unable to maintain party discipline on the wage-law issue before Congress. Moreover, Figueiredo seems powerless to impose his choice for president. Congressman Maluf, whom Figueiredo detests, is far ahead in the race for the party's nomination. According to Embassy reporting, some government officials are speculating that the President may seats on the party's national directorate in elections last June, and the administration has been unable to maintain party discipline on the wage-law issue before Congress. Moreover, Figueiredo seems powerless to impose his choice for president. Congressman Maluf, whom Figueiredo detests, is far ahead in the race for the party's nomination. According to Embassy reporting, some government officials are speculating that the President may	Divisions within the ruling party are contributing to the
and the administration has been unable to maintain party discipline on the wage-law issue before Congress. Moreover, Figueiredo seems powerless to impose his choice for president. Congressman Maluf, whom Figueiredo detests, is far ahead in the race for the party's nomination. According to Embassy reporting, some government officials are speculating that the President may Figueiredo seems powerless to impose his choice for president. Congressman Maluf, whom Figueiredo detests, is far ahead in the race for the party's nomination. According to Embassy reporting, some government officials are speculating that the President may	and the administration has been unable to maintain party Congressman Maluf, whom Figueiredo detests, is far ahead in the race for the party's nomination. According to Embassy reporting, some government officials are speculating that the President may race for the party's nomination. According to Embassy reporting, some government officials are speculating that the President may	Congressman Maluf, whom Figueiredo detests, is far ahead in the remove himself from the succession process.	race for the party's nomination. According to Embassy reporting,
The state of the state of the production pro	remove himself from the succession process.
	The state of the s

Sanitized Copy Approved for Release 2010/11/26 : CIA-RDP85T00287R000500050001-3

25X1

The continuing erosion of the administration's influence is reflected in its miscalculation of Congressional opposition to the wage-restraint policy required by the IMF as a condition for resuming disbursements of the rescue package. In recent weeks the Chamber of Deputies has twice repealed decrees limiting wage hikesthe first defeats of government-sponsored bills since the military seized power in 1964. Figueiredo's public call for a compromise last month acknowledged the legislature's new role in decisionmaking, but the opposition so far has spurned this overture, at least openly.	25X1 25X1
Government party leaders are continuing negotiations to obtain the opposition parties' acceptance of a substitute decree-law enacted on 20 October. This measure would shift more of the burden of austerity to high-income groups by introducing a sliding scale of wage hikes, with the lowest-paid workers receiving increases at 100 percent of inflation. The law also provides for tax reforms and a phase-in of collective bargaining to replace government regulation of wages. The administration hopes these concessions will win middle class, labor, and opposition party acquiescence in the austerity program.	25X1
We believe the Figueiredo administration's new tactic of combining a broader compromise with a more judicious use of political muscle stands a reasonably good chance of ultimately gaining political acceptance for an austerity package in line with the recent IMF accord, but protracted negotiations would likely delay the restoration of loan payments. The US Embassy reports that the complexity of the ruling party's proposal makes passage unlikely this month or even next. As a compromise is mediated, however, foreign creditors will remain uncertain about t government's ability to obtain backing for the legislation.	h e
Prospects	25 X 1
If Figueiredo remains indecisive, day-to-day decisionmaking will center in the hands of five or six military and civilian advisers. Without an authoritative mediator, the administration is likely to continue floundering, further eroding public confidence.	25X1
There is, however, little likelihood the military will intervene directly unless the security situation deteriorates sharply. During his term Figueiredo has purged most hardliners from the upper ranks, and the high command is composed of moderates loyal to the President and committed to a return to civilian rule. Nonetheless, the officer corps is unlikely to tolerate another 18 months of governmental inactivity, his military advisers may urge him to resign.

Sanitized Copy Approved for Release 2010/11/26 : CIA-RDP85T00287R000500050001-3

25X1

25X6

25X1

Even if the President shakes off his lethargy and reasserts himself, we believe he could not regain his former control over the political process. The loosening of authoritarian measures over the past few years has deprived the government of the legal means to suppress dissent and impose its programs. Ultimately, the military could halt the transition to civilian rule, and it is the implicit threat of such action that may restrain the opposition to some extent.

25X1

Over the near term, Brasilia probably will continue to muddle through, trying to balance the economic need for belttightening against the political demands for an easing of the austerity program. The likely delay in the government's efforts to pass new compromise economic legislation will further stretch the limits of Brazil's already tenuous foreign exchange position. many international bankers will not consider resumption of lending until an IMF accord is consummated. This will impair Brasilia's ability to obtain not only the $16.5 billion in financial commitments lined up to meet the foreign financing gap through 1984 but also critically needed bridge loans. Without imminent restoration of foreign credits, the country's imports will be squeezed harder, thereby further crippling agricultural and industrial production. Brasilia will be forced to allow its foreign payments arrears to rise considerably above its current $2.5 to $3.0 billion levels, previously thought intolerable by foreign bankers. Importantly, numerous outstanding US bank loans would likely have to be placed in a non-performing status at year's end, and we believe the risks of a default declaration would escalate.

25X1

25X1

Even presuming Brasilia successfully hurdles the challenge of working out a new economic bill with the Congress, we foresee continuing difficulties in implementing austerity. Although the government will strive to keep the IMF program on track and

25X1

25X1

ς

maintain workable relations with foreign creditors, it will be hardpressed to withstand building domestic pressures for modifications to any program. Moreover, a continuing decline in economic activity would risk an increase in already high unemployment and, consequently, burgeoning social unrest.	25 X 1
A cycle of spreading disorder and growing political opposition from the middle class and labor will intensify interest among Brazilian policymakers in declaring a moratorium	25 X 1
on foreign debt payments.	25 X 1
According to press reports, some bankers believe Brasilia may be building up its foreign-exchange and oil reservesat the expense of permitting foreign arrears to mount to $3 billionin the event it is forced to declare a moratorium on interest payments.	25 X 1
Initially, Brasilia might contemplate a temporary moratorium-perhaps 90 daysaimed at pressuring foreign banks to accept a more generous long-term restructuring of Brazil's debt. A moratorium of this sort, however, would be a gamble for the government and could well result in stalemated negotiations. In this event, trade credits probably would contract and economic activity would plummet. Nonetheless, despite the risks, Brasilia might see this nationalist option as a means of deflecting public resentment and creating a new political consensus to shore up the government's eroding	25.4
legitimacy.	25 X 1

```
Subject: Brazil: Figueiredo's Government Struggling
                                                                     25X1
Distribution:
    Copy 1. - Requestor
         2. - Executive Director
         3. - NIO/LA
         4. - NIO/Economics
         5. - NIC/AG
         6. - PDB Staff
         7. - C/DDI/PES
         8. - DDI/CPAS/ILS
         9. - D/ALA
     10-11. - ALA/PS
        12. - ALA Research Director
     13-16. - OCPAS/IMC/CB
        17. - C/SAD
        18. - SAD file
       19. - C/SAD/SE
        20. - Analyst
        21. - SAD/SE Chrono
```

DDI/ALA/SAD/SE

(21 October 1983)

25X1

